

Hello,

For 10.1.2. 10.2.1, I am not sure if adding this would bring information overload to this section, but I think it would be nice to mention the creation of Germany, and to a lesser extent, Italy, since you mentioned, "subsequent Napoleonic Wars resulted in the establishment of a new type of political structure, the nation-state." That part was not well expanded even though it talks about nationalism and the bigger representation of the people. The Napoleonic Wars did convince the decentralized German region to finally defend itself from future invasion, like France, which therefore created a formidable German nation that eventually stabilized central Europe and break apart the usual French-British dominance on the continent. Germany was also part of Industrialization, which is after this section, and created an intense rivalry with Britain on who could modernize its economy faster for European dominance (which brings up the reasons for Industrialization.)
